Garden Roses

THERE is quite a distinction between "Good Roses" and "Good Garden Roses"; those that are excellent under glass may be worthless in the garden, while some varieties that succeed in mild climates are constitutionally unfit for the gardens of more Northerly points. It has therefore been our first endeavor to choose kinds that we know will give a good account of themselves under most trying conditions of soil and climate, and we believe our list comprises the finest new and standard varieties for everybody's garden.

In order to have good Roses a thorough preparation of the beds is essential. Spade ground at least 2 feet deep and mix it with one-third of well rotted cow manure. If possible, prepare the beds some time in advance of planting.

While they prefer somewhat heavy soil, they will do well in lighter kinds if additional food is supplied in the shape of artificial fertilizers. Roses like plenty of water, but cannot stand soggy or wet ground, and care must be taken to have the soil well drained.

Plant Hybrid Teas 18 inches apart and Hybrid Perpetuals 24 inches apart.

Careful planting is imperative. Dig the holes large enough to allow for the spreading of all roots and plant them deep enough so as to have the graft 2 or 3 inches in the ground. Many people plant Roses too high.

They can be planted in Fall or early Spring. Fall planting is strongly recommended and will be found very successful if the following rules are observed. Plant them as deep as indicated and do not cut them back until following Spring. Protect them by banking them with earth 8 to 10 inches high and, if necessary, cover them with evergreen boughs.

During the Summer continuous cultivation of the soil to a depth of from 2 to 3 inches will help them materially. Additional fertilizers during the growing season in the shape of bonemeal, etc., are very beneficial.

For Rose bugs spray with Bordeaux mixture, and for aphis with a weak solution of soap and nicotine. There are at present available insecticides specially recommended for Roses. (See our general catalog.)

We make a specialty of Roses and Rose gardens and will gladly submit a complete list arranged for color effects, also estimates as well as plans for any size garden.
